After a number of unfortunate delays, the editorial team is happy to finally get the 2025 issue out into the world. This issue contains three scholarly articles, three essays/narratives, poems by six different poets, and three reviews. The first review comes in the form of an interview by a member of our editorial advisory board, who are so often unseen by our readers but whose contributions to the journal are very important. I am especially grateful for the input the advisory board provides concerning administrative and strategic decisions for the journal, and the editorial team for their work with review, vetting, copyediting, and layout. It would not be possible for the Trumpeter to exist in its current state without their contributions, all of them volunteers. So thank-you! I trust that our readers, too, will find the contents of this issue edifying and challenging, as the case may be, amid very disconcerting developments in our world, both social and natural. Blessings on you all.
